Maude Adams played her famous part as Maggie Wylie in Str James Barrie's comedy on the speaking stage she sug-gested the pathos of the husband's faithlessness, even when she was asking loss as one does in making out an income tax report.

Barrie on the stage is difficult enough, but on the exceen he seems to be a barrier. Ceell B. De Mille managed to put the Scotch dramatist's "The Admirable Crichton" over on the silver sheet mainly by some factitious aids in "Male and Female" that weren't in the original, but his brother, William De Mille, in his screen version of the later work.

sticks to the original closely and yet seems to wander as far away from Thrums as Los Angeles.

This is zurely Barrie's most delicious and finely finished product, yet at the Rivoil yesterday it aroused scarcely more of a ripple than the weekly news digest. This Paramount picture may be disconting enough as a mere movie, but as a shadowing forth of a piece that many remember as a spoken delight it more than a voice from the seems little more than a voice from the seems little more than a voice form the seems little more than a voice of cast. ling, for while Miss Adams probably had the ideal company for this play, the present producers seem to have mistakenly picked types rather than good actors, and the result is Scotch mistrather than Scotland.

Follows Miss Adams's Poses. Miss Wilson looks suppressed enough

Frohman star did, so that it is nothing less than miraculous at the end that she should suddenly convert the stony Shand to laughter, and turn his character topsy-turvy. Only an actress with the skill of Madge Kennedy should have been allowed out with this role.

Conrad Nagel, featured in the cast as Shand, does perhaps the best work of any one, even though he doesn't follow Richard Bennett's characterization of the self-confident young man who broke NEAR NIGHT IN CELLS

BAD MAN' COMPANY

Players Lose Pass Richard Bennett's characterization of the self-confident young man who broke into a house to study, but works his own will with the role. The other players seem just whiskers and Burnsides stuck here and there in the picture. Olga Printzlau has kept closely to Barrie's dialogue and stage directions for the titles, but some of the best parts seem to have been dropped out and well anylow, the "Phedre" overture, attractive scenes from "Faust" sung by a trio an an "Out of the Inkwell" cartoon give the programme a big lift.

Seeing this picture, and then viewing Charles Ray in "The Old Swimmin' Hole," at the Strand, calls to mind the story that Bernard Shaw said to Barrie Hole," at the Strand, calls to mind the story that Bernard Shaw said to Barrie that the ideal movies would be those without any titles, and Barrie, who had just seen one of his own, replied that the best would be all titles and no pictures. Ray's adaptation for First National of James Whitcomb Riley's poem has essayed the innovation of practically dispensing with formal subtitles, constituting not only a new departure, but a picture that manages, with entrancing photographic embellishment, to be a bit of literature.

The only written clues for the audience are the entries in Erre's diary, and even the cast is introduced as though Erra scrawled them on his school slate between raps on his knuckles. Yet because of Ray's remarkably youthful expressiveness the audience was able yegoreday to follow every turn in the rustic somedy, and laughed themselves back ing scenes at the swimming hole, in school and at a picnic, and Ray proves ilmself a screen Tom Sawyer.
